

ABSTRACT

In a golf ball, triangular dimples each defined by 5 combining three ridge-like lands having a side length of 2-9 mm are arranged on the spherical surface. The percent occupation of the total dimple area over the entire spherical surface area is significantly increased, even to substantially 100%, and the ball is drastically improved in 10 flight performance.